Introducing the Human Genome

The Strategy for 2000

The strategy for the Human Genome Project is to identify and map all the genes in the human genome. This is a massive task, as the human genome contains approximately 3 billion base pairs of DNA. The project is organized into several phases, with the first phase being the identification and mapping of the genes. This is followed by the sequencing of the DNA, and then the analysis of the data to identify the genes and their functions.

Key Milestones

The Human Genome Project has achieved several key milestones since its inception in 1990. In 1996, the first draft of the human genome was published. This was followed by the completion of the first human genome map in 2001. In 2003, the project was declared complete, and the full sequence of the human genome was published. This has opened up a new era of research in genetics and medicine, and has the potential to revolutionize our understanding of human biology.
