

Instruments Used in Psychotherapy and Counselling Process Research

In Chapter 1, I presented some of the instruments used for measuring psychotherapy outcome. Many of these instruments are not unknown to practising clinicians as they are used in routine practice either for the assessment or for the monitoring of treatment outcome. Psychotherapy process measuring instruments are less well known as they are typically not very useful for everyday practice (but there are exceptions such as the Core Conflictual Relationship Theme Method; Luborsky & Crits-Christoph, 1998).

Lambert and Hill (1994) classify psychotherapy process research instruments with regard to whether they use the client's view of the process, the therapist's view of the process or the expert's or trained observer's view of the process. Other factors they take into consideration are whether the method gathers information on the client or the therapist, what aspect of the therapeutic process it focuses on (e.g. therapeutic alliance), what type of coding or scaling it uses and what theoretical constructs it examines (e.g. transference).

Heppner, Kivlighan and Wampold (1999) differentiate methods for measuring the area that is being investigated using the seven areas delineated by Hill (1991; see above) and they add Elliott's (1991) concept of quality of the process. Furthermore, they distinguish whether the instrument measures one of the outlined areas on a micro or a macro level, where micro level means that the instrument measures utterances and macro level means that the unit of analysis is either the whole session or its parts.

For the purpose of this book I will utilize the simpler distinction of Greenberg and Pinsof (1986). These authors use a basic division of process methods into participative and non-participative methods. In participative methods, therapy participants, clients and therapists are the users of the instrument; while non-participative methods use independent observers.

Participative Process Methods

Participative methods assess clients' and therapists' views of their interaction and its impacts. Participative methods can be further divided according to different criteria, e.g. what aspect of the process they assess or what unit of analysis they use (see the division stated above). Here, however, I will present the methods pragmatically according to examples of the most commonly used methods.
