Abstract

In order to solve our ecological crisis, it is crucial to have a fair understanding of its background. In this article I integrate the most important driving forces of human transformation of the biosphere into a general model. First, I show that it is the economic subsystem of society that produces nearly all human transformation of the biosphere. Then I differentiate between direct driving forces, which are the number of people/households, the economic output per capita/per household, the environmental impact of technologies, the structure of the economy and the geographical pattern of the economy; and indirect ones, which are the mind of people, social institutions, biological factors and physical geographical features. The behavior of individuals, groups of people and organizations mediates between indirect and direct driving forces. The model also shows us the basic strategies of environmental sustainability. Cultural changes are needed to attenuate the direct driving forces. In turn, these changes will happen only if those desiring them will have enough power to reshape social institutions and the mind of people.

Introduction

What are the main driving forces behind our ecological crisis? The question is simple, but the answer is complex. Nevertheless, if our aim is to solve this crisis, it is crucial to have a fair understanding of its background. The thorough uncovering of the factors behind our ecological predicament is pivotal to the identification of the basic strategies of environmental sustainability.

The current ecological crisis (comprised of interwoven environmental problems such as global climate change, loss of biodiversity, soil degradation, smogs, toxic effects of synthetic chemicals etc.) is the result of excessive human transformation of the biosphere.¹ This means that our biosphere transforming activities are not necessarily problematic. By now, however, they have become so extended and accelerated that even our own well-being—as well as the existence of many other species—is already threatened.

In this article I try to integrate the most important driving forces of human transformation of the biosphere into a general model. The goal here is not the quantification of the particular driving forces or determining the relative role of these various factors, but gaining a better understanding of the causes of our ecological crisis and its potential solutions. The analysis will be done on the global scale, though it may be valid on smaller scales as well.

The model has its predecessors. It is built around the well-known IPAT-formula (see below). Nevertheless, the formula is refined, developed and put in a wider context here.

¹ Biosphere is the part of the Earth in which life engaged in active metabolism naturally exists (Hutchinson 1970). In some rare cases human transformation of the natural environment goes beyond the boundaries of the biosphere (e.g., the depletion of the stratospheric ozone layer). For the sake of simplicity, these processes are also considered as transformations of the biosphere in this article. The use of the term “biosphere” is preferred here instead of “environment” or “nature,” because it is more well-defined than the others.
