One of the most fascinating aspects of Goldsworthy's pebble assemblage above is the way he has organized the natural colors of the stones to enhance the black void of the hole at the center of the piece. It is difficult at first to see anything else but that black opening, and while the eye can move outwards to appreciate the graduated colors and shapes of the stones we are inevitably swept back to the center.

In Robert Arneson's clay portrait of artist Jackson Pollock we are presented with an unfailing focal point
