

building. In short, these include: (1) the presence of a 'clear development strategy'; (2) the capability to import technology ('branch-plants are better than no plants'); (3) the presence of 'synergy' between players; (4) the presence of 'long-term vision' to develop the region; (5) the identification of 'sources of innovation'; (6) the early establishment of networks ('mechanisms and channels for information to flow'); (7) appropriate distances of regions from core industrial centres; (8) the need for selectivity in 'longer-distance strategies' (that is, it may be necessary to focus on more appropriate areas that suit technopole development rather than use a 'scatter-shot strategy' that is politically acceptable but 'fails to build up momentum anywhere'); (9) 'major central inducements' (government funding); (10) capacity to 'identify new niches' (that is, a region is able to penetrate and capitalise on niche markets); (11) the presence of 'protective mechanisms' that will 'insulate the project, for a long period, against premature accusations of failure'; and finally (12) recognition that evaluation of regional development according to the 'most rigorous exclusive criteria' may overlook the possibility of other 'useful fall-out effects' (pp. 248–50).

The authors outline their intent in the opening paragraphs of their work as a desire 'to bring together in one descriptive-analytic account, the most important ventures in constructing technopoles worldwide' (p. 2). In the main, they follow truly to their course, and although some may consider the work more descriptive than analytical there are valuable insights to be gleaned from the work. The authors handle the multi-disciplinary nature of their topic well, moving between economics, history, sociology, planning, business and geography with commendable adroitness. They explore weighty contemporary issues and do well to illuminate an area often subject to considerable verbiage but little enlightenment. Overall, the work is an important, readable and valuable contribution to the literature on high technology and regional development. It is well worth examining if the reader's interests lie in this direction.

The Political Economy of Communication: Rethinking and Renewal

Vincent Mosco

London, Sage, 1996, x + 307 pp., AU$38.95, ISBN 0-8039-8561-4

The book is dedicated to students and so it is not unreasonable for students to ask: 'what does political economy have to do with communication?' In this book, Mosco responds to the question by offering a guide to political economy and how it can be used to study the media and communication.³

From classical to postmodern theorists, Mosco takes on 'an inclusive, open, and non-reductionist perspective' into the study of the political economy of communication. While touching on various theoretical viewpoints, Mosco, nonetheless, provides some practical applications of the field.

The book is divided into two parts. In Part I, Mosco maps the political economy of communication and adopts a 'historical, descriptive and critical' approach. He starts off with the question 'What is Political Economy?' and defines it in terms of power relations between the production, distribution and consumption of resources. He proceeds on with a discussion of its central characteristics—social change and history, social totality, moral
