Hess,2012 To effectively serve and protect citizens of Los Angeles in the 21st Century the Los Angeles Police Department LAPD recognized the need to train police officers in tactical and interpersonal skills that reflected a community policing model This decision was influenced by findings of several studies that were initiated in response to the 1991 Rodney King beating incident where LAPD officers were found to engage in ethnic discrimination and excessive use of force In 2007 LAPD leadership redesigned the LAPD Academy Recruit Basic Course RBC by adopting a problem solving focused scenario based curriculum that integrated tactical and communication skills within the CAPRA community policing model An exploratory mixed qualitative quantitative method was used to evaluate recruits P1s ability to generalize their communications skills training in the field during the first four weeks after graduating from the redesigned RBC Field Training Officer FTO responses to in depth interviews were evaluated regarding P1s ability to adapt when communicating with different kinds of people their ability to address conflict and ratings of P1s communication skills as compared to recruits trained under the old curriculum FTO survey evaluations of P1s communication skills were examined and compared to P1s demographic characteristics Results suggested that P1s were able to adapt when communicating with different kinds of people they were able to effectively address conflict and they were able to generalize their communication skills in the field regardless of demographic differences Implications for police recruit training are discussed Police Talk: Scenario Based Comm&cj Eval Pk ANONIMO,2003-09-01 Twenty-First Century Police Training Lee R. Perry,2011 The diverse requirements work environments and relationships that exist within 21st century police work as well as an increasing emphasis upon community policing philosophy and recommendations of internal and external evaluators necessitate greater levels of self direction problem solving and critical thinking among law enforcement officers In response to these needs the Los Angeles Police Department has implemented changes within its academy curricula and methods of instruction including the use of adult learning concepts problem based learning and the use of scenario based learning and simulation activities In order to evaluate the efficacy of these changes a coding manual was developed to measure the extent to which recruits utilized the Clients Acquiring and Analyzing Information Partnerships Response Assessment CAPRA problem solving model to respond to a written domestic violence scenario An evaluation of the utility and reliability of this manual as well as the relationships between recruit scores and final academy grades and demographics were explored Using the Communication of Police Officers to Assess the Relationship Between Self-Talk and Communication Apprehension Fabian Carrillo,2020-07-13 Doctoral Thesis Dissertation from the year 2020 in the subject Psychology Social Psychology grade n a language English abstract The purpose of this research study was to assess the relationship between self talk and communication apprehension among police officers within a western city police department WCPD Within the framework of the communication accommodation theory the researcher expected that police officers would use self talk to mitigate apprehension by adjusting their communication with the publics they engage with Topics discussed within the literature review in respect to police officers include gaining public trust public perceptions team collaborations facing stereotypes mental illness message diffusion and social media The researcher collected data from a convenience sample of 50 police officers from WCPD using the Personal Report of Communication Apprehension and the Self Talk Scale The results suggest that high self talk usage is associated with low scores of communication apprehension and that high scores of self talk usage are associated with high scores for the public speaking component of communication apprehension These findings justify further research with larger samples more representative of WCPD officers whose results could serve as a basis for developing training for this population
