The Rise of International Parliaments Frank Schimmelfennig, Thomas Winzen, Tobias Lenz, Jofre Rocabert, Lorian Crasnic, Cristina Gherasimov, Jana Lipps, Densua Mumford, 2020-12-14 International parliaments are on the rise An increasing number of international organizations establishes international parliamentary institutions or IPIs which bring together members of national parliaments or in rare cases elected representatives of member state citizens Yet IPIs have generally remained powerless institutions with at best a consultative role in the decision making process of international organizations Why do the member states of international organizations create IPIs but do not vest them with relevant institutional powers This study argues that neither the functional benefits of delegation nor the internalization of democratic norms answer this question convincingly Rather IPIs are best understood as an instrument of strategic legitimation By establishing institutions that mimic national parliaments governments seek to ensure that audiences at home and in the wider international environment recognize their international organizations as democratically legitimate At the same time they seek to avoid being effectively constrained by IPIs in international governance

The Rise of International Parliaments provides a systematic study of the establishment and empowerment of IPIs based on a novel dataset In a statistical analysis covering the world's most relevant international organizations and a series of case studies from all major world regions we find two varieties of international parliamentarization International organizations with general purpose and high authority create and empower IPIs to legitimate their region building projects domestically Alternatively the establishment of IPIs is induced by the international diffusion of democratic norms and prominent templates above all that of the European Parliament
