

QUEEN OF THE SEAS

By The Right

THE building of the Queen Mary represents the decision of Great Britain to regain the Blue Ribbon of the Atlantic passenger service. This decision has been long delayed and many circumstances most vexatious to British minds have obstructed it.

After the war, too many weapons of power, Germany was disarmed, Atlantic liners in replacement of a volume of tonnage sunk by the shelling, covered the two power's Emperor and Emperor.

the last wartime magnificence, luxury and modernity, and which eclipsed all rivals by three or four knots speed. Germany thus re-asserted upon the transatlantic passenger trade in the most favourable circumstances, competing with her own old ships, now in British hands, with brand-new vessels built on money borrowed from the Allies: Great Britain, weighed down with debt, unable by the economic blitzard, and disappointed in German repayment, found herself unable to put contemporary vessels in the water to meet this new challenge.

There are a few other matter noted in a most lamentable plight. Meanwhile other countries, particularly Italy, both great and splendid show us the very latest type. Since the Apollonia was built no transatlantic liner of the first order had been laid down in British yards. Nearly a quarter of a century has therefore passed without any opportunity being given to our designers to construct the mammoth vessels, in the light of the knowledge of new types and requirements the travelling public, which have developed since then. The glory of the Apollonia and Manovatsia is that they have, for all this period, been able to make head against the tremendous state-aided competition of ships very much younger than themselves. It is from this fact that we may draw great hopes for the future.

In all questions of re-equipment on a large scale, however, can afford to wait till the last has the opportunity of going from the bottom to the top of the class. Such was the position when Great Britain began to recover from the world slump of 1932 and 1933. The ordered and orthodox system of our business enabled both public and private enterprise to look forward to a new and successful effort to re-establish our industrial and maritime supremacy. The decision to build the Queen Mary, which must of course carry with it the building of a sister ship, was the result of this spirit. Her launch by Her Majesty Queen Mary in 1934 was an occasion of national rejoicing. Her entry into the transatlantic passenger service this month will signify and symbolize the revival of British industry and the British nation to assert their long undiminished
