

Analysis of Question Content and Strategies

1. General analysis of question content and strategies

(1) Analysis of number of questions & question fields

Every year, questions are broadly divided into four Sections, numbered I to IV. In the past few years, the questions have been presented in the following manner.

- Sections I and II are each a combination of different fields, structured as Questions 1 and 2.
In Section I, Question 1 is a basic problem on quadratic functions and Question 2 is on number of cases and probability. Section I also often shares problems with Course 1.
In Section II, Question 1 is mainly drawn from vectors or sequences, while Question 2 is mainly drawn from complex planes or figures and equations.
- In Sections III and IV, questions are set on differential and integral calculus and related complex problems.

[List of question content in the new syllabus]

Numbers and expressions, quadratic functions, figures and calculations, numbers of cases and probability, properties of integers, properties of figures, various expressions, figures and equations, exponential functions and logarithmic function, trigonometric functions, concepts of differentiation and integration, sequences, vectors, complex planes, curves in planes, limits, differential calculus, integral calculus.

(2) General strategies

Since the questions widely cover many different fields, you will need to study for the entire range of questions. However, unlike the Japanese standardized test for university admissions, it should be noted that the largest number of questions are from the "Differential and Integral Calculus" section of Mathematics III. Therefore, the basic approach in preparing for Course 2 is to focus on mastering differential and integral calculus, reinforcing what is necessary to achieve this.

Although none of the problems are extremely difficult, you will need to have solid computational skills in order to tackle all the problems in the 80 minutes of the examination time. For this reason, it's important to solve problems repeatedly, rather than once only, to train yourself to improve your calculating speed.

Avoid rushing your study, and don't get fixated on simply memorizing all the answers.

Make sure you achieve good results by referring to the strategies outlined below.

2. Strategies for each field

(1) Differential calculus and integral calculus (including sequences and limits of sequences)

This is the most important area in the scope of questions in Course 2, and also serves as a foundation for science subjects studied at university. This is the area in which you will need to spend the most time in preparation for the Course 2 exam. As solid calculation skills are required to solve problems in a timely manner, you need to try to improve your calculation speed by repeatedly practicing calculations.

Regardless of your current mathematical ability, let's start with differential calculus and integral calculus.

Next, objectively analyze your own abilities, asking yourself "What am I missing in order to master differential calculus and integral calculus?" For example, if you find that you do not know the definitions of differential calculus,
