The New Significance of Learning Pádraig Hogan, 2009-12-04 Should education be understood mainly as a practice in its own right or is it essentially a subordinate affair to be shaped and controlled by a society's powers that be What difference does it make if students are chiefly viewed as recipients of a set of skills and knowledge or as active participants in their own learning Does education have a responsibility in cultivating humanity's maturity or are its purposes to be effectively matched to the functional requirements of a globalized age The New Significance of Learning explores these and other high stakes questions It challenges hierarchical and custodial conceptions of education that have been inherited as the natural order of things It discloses a more original and imaginative understanding of educational practice illustrating this understanding with frequent practical examples Among the merits highlighted by this approach are a recognition that education is first and foremost an invitation to join a renewed experience of quest and disclosure a realisation that taking up and pursuing such an invitation is a basic right as distinct from a privilege to be bestowed or withheld an awareness of the decisive importance of specific kinds of relationships in practices of teaching and learning an emphasis on the human qualities as well as the intellectual achievements nourished by dedicated communities of learning an acknowledgement of partiality of incompleteness and bias in even the best of humankind's learning efforts the emergence of a distinctive ethical orientation for education as a practice in its own right
