

Jill Cremer

My shell piece, Sea-Things began with the idea of a scallop shell. I then researched the colors and the shape of the scallop from Looe where I walked often on the Looe coast in California. I watched the "pools" of the shell from above filled in the gaps with purple, white. The shell was from the same area. The two sides were joined together from the edge which left a shallow groove on each side. I filled this with braided fringe and then added embellishments.

Clashwater (Shanku) is a braided hair weaving using blonde 1 x 100 Denier. It is reminiscent of the traditional braids of many cultures. Clashwater (Shanku) represents a Native American woman named after the Clashwater Canyon located off the west coast of the Americas.

The texture of the hair is often most spiritual with pleatherwood fibers. The "veil" on her face and the black roots that her hair feed into the roots of the tree is a reference to the invisible roots of the Clashwater Indians. Look closely and you can see the eye and back of the tree trunk emerge. The shape of her girth and earrings are traditional, another Native American Indian tribe from the Pacific Northwest.

The eyes are closed in typical fashion. View her closely and you will see a woman in a meditative pose with her eyes closed. This piece honors spiritualism, the unknown, the future, and beauty of the sea and its power.

Work and look at her again and you will see a woman with a wild and unruly hair of braiding progression. The pressing blue root will pull you into the braided journey with its eye in the center. This woman symbolizes the temperance nature of the sea and the beautiful woman looking in the deep.
