

Preface

This book examines the history of the genre of origin stories that lie at the foundation of some of the pentateuchal sources and form the basis of the book of Genesis in general. In this book, I have used the term “origin stories” to indicate a literary work based upon a genealogical foundation and plot sequence stretching from the beginning of humanity (or the first humans) to the stories of the group’s patriarchs and its geographical settlement, focusing primarily on questions of group identity and origin. This type of writing is quite well known in later literature – for example, European or Arabic literature – to the extent that it would seem that this literary genre has existed in all cultures from time immemorial. However, in the words of the Israeli poet Nathan Alterman, “Even an old sight has its moment of birth” (“Moon”). Indeed, signs of the existence of this type of literature cannot be found among the multitude of discoveries from the ancient Near East before the second quarter of the first millennium BCE, and its full expression appears only in the eastern Mediterranean literature from this period onward. This book, therefore, endeavors to examine the formation of this genre based on its expression in biblical literature and a series of sources from Greek genealogical and mythographic literature from the Archaic period and the beginning of the Classical Period, as well as traditions from the Phoenician and Luwian cultures of the first millennium BCE.

This book originated in the doctoral dissertation that I wrote at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem under the supervision of Professor Alexander Rofé from the Bible Department and Professor Deborah Levine Gera from the Department of Classical Studies. Both guided me throughout all the stages of my academic studies, from undergraduate
