

intellectual respectability'. . . . There are other metaphors available to criticize that would be more in keeping with feminist first instance, the theoretical metaphor. . . . It suggests a collective enterprise, one that is at least potentially non-hierarchical. It proposes a life-giving and pleasure-giving activity in an arena of liberation from gender and other prescribed roles. It welcomes . . . a multiplicity of styles and personal voices."²²

Now Dyke's equations of feminist criticism with life-affirming militance is extremely disturbing. Her comments speak of that more virulent form of radical feminist ideology. Her suggestions that criticism is male-like unless it's life-affirming implies that, unless the feminist critic once again places herself fully in the service of the playwright—the ultimate creator, the idealized mother of the dramatic text—she is participating in an imperialistic, militarist act that's merely an exercise in power.

As feminist performance critics and theorists move farther into the project of distinguishing the feminine and their concerns from the unconscious mass of pluralism, a peculiar backlash has begun to operate. Liberal feminists such as Catherine Cuddy get uneasy when the canon is attacked; radical feminists such as Ann Dylke refuse to take responsibility for their own positions as critics, insist they regard criticism and theory as male-like, and materialist critics get troubled for their willingness to be "doing" and "being," for attempting to chart new pathways in performance theory's territory.

Although my sympathies are clearly with materialist feminist theorists and therefore cloud my so-called objectivity, I truly don't understand the response to Cane's book, in particular. There appears to be something very threatening about the new feminist book to book critically at theater history, to suggest radical systems of economic texts, and to sort out various strands of feminist ideology from a theoretical perspective. The ideological (state) apparatus works in order effect to protect its interests. But what surprises me is that relatively alternative publications such as Performing Arts Journal and Pleasure's Review of Books are complicit in this repression. The critical attacks (despite radical feminist claims to be anti-aggression) seem part of feminism's general backlash against theory.
