Shame and Guilt Ernest Kurtz, 2007 Shame feeling bad about one's self in shame The deep meaning of the word bad is unable to fit into some external context in the case of guilt unable to fit into one's own being in the case of shame Human experience offers two different ways of discovering that one does not fit of feeling bad Each has to do with the boundaries of the human condition But there are two kinds of boundaries and it is important to recognize their difference the difference between rules and goals For though the human condition is bounded recognizing that reality can be either a choking tightening experience or it can lead to the discovery of a new freedom True shame's negative side points up failure and falling short but shame also entails something positive insight into the reality of the human condition The experience of shame lays bare the essential paradox that inheres in being human to be human is to be caught in a contradictory tension between the pull to the unlimited the more than human and the drag of the merely limited the less than human Shame's healing is to be found in the discovery of how that paradox can be lived creatively in ways that find other human beings to be not the problem in shame but its solution
