

her imagination to ponder the depth of tribal ways and values as these influenced human behavior and history. The scholar must consider the worldview of an Indian group to comprehend its members' system of logic and ideology. In order to accomplish this task, thinking about the "whole" of Indian life is imperative. After this step, it is essential to define the conception of reality constructed by the Indian community. Mainstream conceptions of reality such as those commonly constructed in the contemporary world cannot be used to study the past. The historian has the responsibility to understand the reality a tribe constructed to constitute its historical experiences of the physical and metaphysical as a whole.

Historians who teach and write American Indian history must examine the whole picture in studying Native American societies and cultures. Such a responsibility also involves examining Indian history from the diverse perspectives of whole American views including different bureaucratic positions, missionary beliefs, and humanitarian concerns, as well as from the perspectives of the many tribes. All of these views mutually depend on the subject of study, and it bears repeating that a single Indian view is impractical. Just as one cannot say that there is one European view, neither can one say that there is only one Indian view of history.

The historian's best responsibility in achieving a true balance is to "think like an Indian." While this may seem impractical, studying tribal cultures enables a scholar to understand individual and group behavior within the tribal community. Thinking of a synthetic physical and metaphysical reality allows the scholar to understand Indians as pro-active instead of reactive in respect to historical events. In gaining such a Native perspective it is necessary to use ethnohistorical methodologies to reconstruct history according to how tribal members conceived it.

The extraordinary diversity of perspectives illuminates the sociocultural and political complexity of American Indian history from an external point of view. Combining the external perspective with an understanding of an inner perspective balances the equation, resulting in a proper study of American Indian history. Placing both perspectives within the full context of Indian life is indispensable to the natural world is the ultimate goal in studying and writing American Indian history.

Indian Peoples and the Natural World

Asking the Right Questions

RECHARD WHITE

Methodology is at the heart of any historical endeavor because methodology poses directly the most critical of historical questions: How is it that we claim to know about the past? I will make this more specific. Historians concerned with questions of Indians and the environment have made a series of sweeping claims. They have argued that many Indian peoples had, and some still have, quite distinctive ways of
