

Some Newly-Discovered Contemporary Reviews of Gissing's Early Novels

MARKUS NEACEY
Berlin and Forfar

In his George Gissing, The Definitive Bibliography (2005), Pierre Coustillas lists thirteen known reviews of Gissing's first novel, Workers in the Dawn, all dating from 1880. Twelve of these had been previously recorded in Gissing, The Critical Heritage (1972), four being printed in that volume. By January 1977 (see The Gissing Newsletter of that date) an extremely negative review by Annie Besant in the National Reformer had been discovered. Bouwe Postmus added one more review to the list which he found in the Examiner of 17 July 1880 (see April 2010 issue of The Gissing Journal). I have now discovered two further contemporary reviews of the novel from 1880 and 1881 taking the number of known reviews up to sixteen. Although Gissing was of the opinion (admittedly because he was not aware of a good many of them), and later scholars too, that Workers in the Dawn had received scarcely any notice in the press upon publication owing to Remington's lack of interest in advertising the novel, it seems now that the novel actually received tolerable recognition on its appearance. After all, sixteen reviews is a decent number for a first novel (by comparison 10 years later New Grub Street received thirty-two), and one can assume that there are still more waiting to be discovered in the coming years.

Of the two newly-found reviews, the most unexpected discovery is the unsigned lengthy one from the Western Morning News of 30 May 1881 which appeared almost exactly a year after Workers in the Dawn was originally published. The same review was reprinted in the Rutland Echo and Leicestershire Advertiser on 4 June 1881, a fact which suggests it was published in other regional newspapers around that date. The Western Morning News is a daily regional newspaper still in existence today. It was founded in 1860 by William Saunders (1823-1895), a Liberal Party politician, vice-president of the temperance society United Kingdom Alliance, and radical member of the London County Council in later years, and Edward Spender (1834-1878), a young liberal-minded journalist and champion of the temperance movement. According to the latter's great-grandson, Barney Spender,

Edward Spender saw the potential for a daily newspaper in the regions, immediately able to report what was going on in London; in Parliament, in the courts, in the heart of the nation. To this day Spenders have been good at spotting openings and ideas, less good at following them through, lacking perhaps the business savvy to make them work. If Edward was like that, then he was also lucky. His sister Caroline had married
