Ladies of the Leisure Class Bonnie G. Smith, 2020-03-31 In a social and cultural study of nineteenth century bourgeois women in northern France Bonnie Smith shows how the advent of industrialization removed women from the productive activity of the middle class and confined them to a largely reproductive experience Out of this she suggests they created their own world centered on domesticity family and religion To understand these women the author argues it is necessary to examine their world on its own terms as a coherent whole Professor Smith draws on demographic psychoanalytic anthropological linguistic as well as historical insights and uses a variety of evidence that includes personal interviews photographs letters genealogical records and traditional archival sources Part One outlines the transition from mercantile to industrial manufacturing that terminated the relationship between home and business and that separated the sexes according to their respective functions Part Two concentrates on the lives of the women following their acceptance of an exclusively reproductive function and shows how the interdependence and fusion of household chores religious values and social conscience fostered a unified cultural system Part Three then explores the propagation of this domesticity by the convent as the primary educational system and by the sentimental novel as the vehicle most suited for an ideological expression of domestic life
