

Food balance sheet

- Reference period for food balance sheet is the calendar year
- Food balance sheets provide data on the national average of food supplies.
- In the absence of data from household surveys, food balance sheet data provide a good proxy for food consumption levels of the population as a whole.
- Provide no indication of the food consumption levels:
 - of people living in different geographic areas of the country,
 - or in different occupations,
 - or at different income levels.

Household consumption survey

- Reference period for the survey is the averages during the course of a year.
- Food consumption data obtained through household surveys provide a better estimation of the actual level of food consumption, provided that food eaten away from home is included.
- Household surveys provide details on the distribution of food consumption among different population groups.
