Potential problems associated with rising groundwater levels in the deep aquifer beneath London

Craig, R. N.; Simpson, B.

Proc Tunnel Construction '90, London, 3-4 April 1990 P1-8. Publ London: IMM, 1990

During the past two centuries, the pumping of water from the deep aquifer under London has lowered the groundwater levels by as much as 70 metres. The pumping has reduced in the last thirty or forty years and the water levels are now rising. If the rise continues for the next 20 to 30 years, the groundwater will change the existing stress conditions around tunnels and may cause deformation of the lining, and increase the ingress of water into tunnels. The effects on existing tunnels under London and potential problems for construction of new tunnels are discussed.

Analysis for displacement of the deep road-way in swelling rock

Wang Laigu; Xu Zanghe; Zhang Mangtao

Proc International Symposium on Underground Engineering, New Delhi, 14-17 April 1988 V1, P381-384. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1988

Strength and deformation of swelling rock are not only related to stress state but also to physico-chemical reaction due to water. The physical and mechanical reactions occur simultaneously and thus lead to very complicated problems when dealing with swelling rock. The effect of water on the physical and mechanical characteristics of swelling rock, the expansion and softening, are discussed. Application of finite element methods in the analysis of swelling rock behaviour is also presented.

Tunnelling and subway construction in difficult hydrogeological conditions

Kogan, V. Z.

Proc International Congress on Tunnels and Water, Madrid, 15-18 June 1988 V1, P495-499. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1988

A combination of contour freezing, ice walls to isolate a ground section above an impermeable layer, and compressed air dewatering was used when passing from a shallow to a deep section of the Moscow Metro. In shielded TBM driving of the long Severomyskiy tunnel in water bearing and heavily jointed rock, deep well dewatering, a drainage gallery driven below the tunnel in competent rock, and additional horizontal drains from specially constructed caverns at tunnel level were employed.

Problems encountered during driving of the LEP tunnel (In French)

Laporte, H.

Proc International Congress on Tunnels and Water, Madrid, 15-18 June 1988 V1, P501-509. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1988

The LEP project for CERN in Geneva includes a tunnel of total length 26.6 km, of which 3.4 km are in Jura limestone at depth around 150 m. Water bearing and karstic zones were met, resulting in water flows up to 2000 l/sec at pressures to 15 bars. Injection of cement, polyurethane and silicate grouts was used to control inflow. Systematic grouting was used to minimise further problems, with exploration drilling and seismic surveying ahead of the face to detect potential problems.

911464

Water inflow phenomena during construction of railway tunnels on the Ramdane-Djamel-Jigel line in Algeria

Matuszyk, J. H.; Saczpeński, J. S.

Proc International Congress on Tunnels and Water, Madrid, 15-18 June 1988 V1, P525-527. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1988

Water inflows were seen in 6 tunnels where they were not expected. The tunnels were above the water table in relatively impermeable rocks. Sudden inrush caused roof or wall collapse and swelling of expansive minerals damaged temporary linings. Water was traced to two sources. Free fissure water resulted from channelling of precipitation via high permeability paths in the rock mass arising from weathering. Captive fissure waters were held in disturbed zones. Remedial measures and identification of the problem are discussed.

911465

Injection and drainage for the construction of the Lyons Metro (In French)

Picod, G.; Chapeau, C.; Hamaker, P.

Proc International Congress on Tunnels and Water, Madrid, 15-18 June 1988 V1, P573-580. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1988

The Lyons metro traverses the Fourviere hill through detritic soils of very variable grain size and permeability and some 20 m below the water table. Treatment of grouting the coarser facies situated mostly above the tunnel axis, then drainage of the fine facies mainly below the axis, allowed construction by bench excavation. Systematic analysis of face drilling parameters was used for terrain reconnaissance and facilitated planning of the silicate grout injection.

Surface subsidence, caving and rockbursts

911466

Conditions for origin of floor outbreaks (In German)

Müller, W.

Gluckauf-forschungsk 1991, N3, June 1990, P111-118

Finite element analysis is used to study origins of floor outbreak, which is usually preceded by persistent floor heave. Increased horizontal stress or very high pressure level, for example in the area of a residual pillar, are the main preconditions. Others include presence of a thick seam in the floor together with a shallow steeply dipping fault, narrow mine structure, stratified surrounding rocks, and a solid in-situ seam. Fortunately, simultaneous occurrence of these factors is rare.

911467

Rock bursts hamper the new route to the waterfall

Wallis, S.

Tunn Tunnels V22, N7, July 1990, P33-34

The 3.5 km long, 36 sq m section Eikesdal tunnel in Norway runs through massive gneiss of the Viketaks mountains under an overburden of 800 m. Although fault zones are met, rockburst was considered to be the major problem. The control method adopted was to hold the stresses in check by lightly tensioned rock bolts and fibre reinforced shotcrete. Excavation procedures using drill and blast are described. Average of 2.2 bolts/m is expected when the tunnel is completed.
