

THE ELECTRIFIED STATES OF AMERICA

Electric end use is on the rise. Nearly 40% of homes in the United States are primarily heated by electricity and electric vehicles comprised 3.4% of all light-duty vehicle sales at the end of 2021. Yet, where electric demand is growing and how distribution affects the grid varies from state-to-state.

This map shows the share of electricity to end-use energy in each state.

The more energy-intensive states are those with older buildings, the older stock of cars and trucks, energy-intensive manufacturing, and higher levels of industrial activity. However, many states are working to reduce this.

At 100%, Vermont has the highest share of home heating electric.

Because the state doesn't generate electricity in California, the state's electricity is primarily imported from other states.

Electricity is the largest source of home heating in Vermont, with 100%.

States that use the highest share of electricity for end-use energy are those with the highest levels of electricity use.

States with the highest electricity use are those with the highest levels of electricity use.
