

Facing the Fear: An Analysis of Speech-Anxiety Content in Public-Speaking Textbooks

Judy C. Pearson, Lori DeWitt, Jeffrey T. Child,
David H. Kahl, Jr., & Vijay Dandamudi

Communication apprehension is arguably the largest problem facing novice public speakers. To succeed in the basic communication course, students must learn to overcome or lessen the communication apprehension they feel. Because students learn about communication apprehension largely through the texts they use, the coverage that top ten selling public-speaking textbooks provide has an effect on students' perceptions on the subject. A content analysis of five aspects of CA was conducted, and chi-square analysis was used to determine significant differences among the terms and the texts.

Keywords: Basic Course; Communication Apprehension; Textbooks; Public Speaking

Snakes, small-enclosed spaces, and air travel create apprehension for some people. However, most people can live successful, productive lives while avoiding these fearsome circumstances. A notable exception is the fear of public speaking. Thousands of college students must face their fear of public speaking by taking mandated public speaking courses in American universities each semester.

Public speaking courses are required or recommended on most American college and university campuses. Communication departments report that the fundamental courses comprise between 40% and 60% of their entire set of offerings (Morreale,
