

the design/build concept. Under this arrangement, the owner/agency specifies the project requirements and calls for bids for design and construction. This approach has the advantage of promoting innovation at all stages of design and construction by allowing the design engineer to consider both the type of structure most suited to the site as well as the cost and time of construction.

If U.S. bridge design and construction teams are going to innovate in analytical and construction techniques (or be more effective at adopting innovations that originate elsewhere), adjustments are needed in the ways that clients, legal counselors, insurance carriers, contractors, and engineers conduct their professional and business activities. Moreover, the engineering community, regulating agencies, government, and universities must reconsider their respective roles if the United States is to produce the required innovation. Finally, the local, state, and federal agencies that buy bridges have the responsibility of identifying and managing procurement procedures that promote the best bridge design and efficient construction.

It is worth examining the postwar experience in Europe—an experience that created substantial innovation in bridge design and construction—for lessons applicable to U.S. policy.

THE EUROPEAN EXPERIENCE

Europe's dominance in bridge engineering and construction emerged during reconstruction efforts after World War II, when hundreds of major structures had to be replaced rapidly under tough economic and industry conditions. Steel fabricators were not ready to roll structural steel for bridge applications, so as concrete substituted for steel as the dominant material for bridge building, the combined design/build concept was adopted to encourage competition and reduce design and construction time.

The postwar European experience can be divided into two distinct historical decades, each with its own special character. In the 1950s Ulrich Finsterwalder introduced cast-in-place, segmental balanced cantilever prestressed concrete construction, and the structures built between the introduction of this technology and 1962 have been generally labeled as the first generation of modern bridge development.

In the 1950s it was demonstrated that by using the "balanced cantilever" method of erection, precast or cast-in-place concrete segments could be joined together progressively on top of a pier to form half of a bridge span on each side of the pier. In similar fashion and simultaneously, concrete segments erected on another pier, opposite the first, could be used to close the center span. This method of erection, used repetitively, created multispan bridges with very long center spans—as long as 750 feet (230 meters). Balanced cantilever construction also offers the advantages of eliminating ground-supported formwork over deep valleys, navigable channels, and congested
