

Introduction to:

Problem Oriented Approach in Pediatric Radiology

Introduction

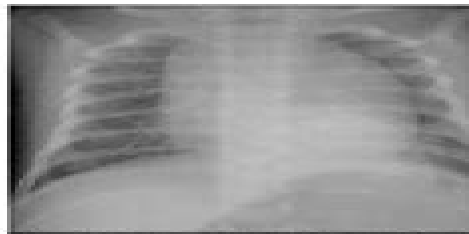

Pediatric Radiology is the application of diagnostic radiology in the understanding ,diagnosis, therapy, and follow up of diseases of infants and children.

To minimize radiation risks and maximize benefits from any imaging examination ,the procedure should be tailored to the specific clinical problem.

An algorithm for each clinical presentation , will help to reach a "definite " diagnosis ,with the least radiation exposure and cost .

The referring physician ,as well as the pediatric Radiologist ,have the duty to take PROBLEM ORIENTED DECISIONS ,which will decide ,which techniques will be used or omitted in any given clinical situation ,so as to reach the appropriate diagnosis.

I-Thorax

CXR-showing a large mediastinal mass lesion .

1. Patient with a chest mass.

The clinical problem :

The discovery of a chest mass on CXR is a common finding which can happen in the course of investigation for a tachypneic child ,signs of SVC obstruction ,coughing ,chest infection ,or incidentally.

The need for identifying a normal thymus is needed.

The location of chest mass is necessary to build a working differential diagnosis.

Role of Radiology:

An approach including CXR with chest US has been proposed by some authors .

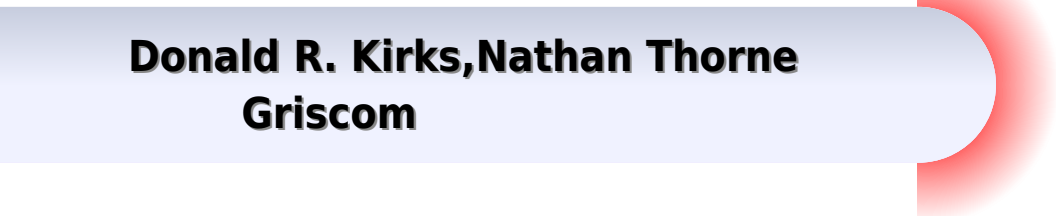

The technique depends on examining the chest through suprasternal ,parasternal and sub-xiphoid windows.

The main role of U.S. is :

1. Identify a normal thymus.
