

PURIFICATION OF II-VI COMPOUNDS BY SOLVENT EXTRACTION*

M. Aven and H. H. Woodbury

General Electric Research Laboratory

(Received August 13, 1962)

Single crystals of the wide-band-gap II-VI compounds ZnTe, ZnSe, ZnS, and CdS can be prepared by either the melt growth or the vapor-phase growth techniques. In either case, the materials are in contact with refractory container materials for considerable lengths of time at high temperatures and are hence subject to contamination by diffusion of impurities from the container material into the crystal. Very often, therefore, even the most painstakingly purified starting materials do not lead to comparably pure single crystals. The floating zone purification technique used successfully with many semiconductor materials is, in principle, possible with II-VI compounds. However, because of the high vapor pressure developed by ZnSe, ZnS, and CdS at their respective melting points, the required apparatus is rather complex. As a result, most research on wide-band-gap II-VI compounds has been carried out with material having a residual impurity concentration in the part per million range.

It is the object of this communication to describe the application of solvent extraction to the purification of the above compounds, by which treatment several of the electrically and optically active impurities in these compounds can be reduced to the part per billion range.

The method consists in heating the crystal to be purified in contact with a molten metal in which the particular impurity to be extracted is readily soluble: the logical choice for the solvent metal being Zn for ZnTe, ZnSe, and ZnS, and Cd for CdS. The extraction is carried out by sealing the crystal with two to ten times its weight of Zn or Cd in a small quartz tube under vacuum and heating it for a time sufficient to establish equilibrium between the solid and the liquid phases. For ZnTe, temperatures between 900 and 1000°C and firing times of approximately one day are sufficient to establish equilibrium. For ZnSe and ZnS the extraction occurs best at 1000–1050°C and takes one to two days. For

CdS, temperatures between 800 and 900°C for two to five days appear to produce equilibrium. All these times are for crystals with minimum dimensions of 1–3 mm. In all cases the molten metal dissolves 1–5% of the crystal.

The removal of acceptor type impurities from ZnTe, ZnSe, and CdS was monitored by a radioactive tracer technique using the isotopes Cu^{64} and/or Ag^{110} . The Cu^{64} or Ag^{110} was first diffused into the bulk of the crystal, following which the crystal was chemically etched to remove any surface excess of the dopant and the total gamma radiation was counted. The total Cu or Ag concentration was between 10^{17} and 10^{19} cm^{-3} . The crystal was then heated in contact with the molten metal, following which it was again chemically etched and a second gamma radiation count was carried out. From the two gamma counts and the relative weights of the crystal and the solvent metal, the segregation coefficients¹ given in Table I were obtained.

The high purity of the II-VI compounds crystals treated by the above described extraction technique has manifested itself in the following electrical and optical properties:

Table I. Summary of Results on Extracting Cu and Ag from II-VI Compounds

Impurity Removed	Crystal	Solvent	Firing Temperature (°C)	Segregation Coefficient
				$\times 10^{-5}$
Ag	ZnTe	Zn	950	3
Ag	ZnSe	Zn	950	2
Ag	CdS	Cd	900	< 2
Cu	ZnTe	Zn	900	2
