

an art which, that is that of design or disegno, defines the whole of the above period, and of which there are a few traces written, considering all that is done in life, you will find that knowing it, such points this world, in becoming and growing, and before and in using new styles of clothing and pictures, occupying space, raising buildings and houses almost without calculating build, placing the fields in stripes and patterns, and so on by means of sails, in timber, in coloring the face of the land in all our operations, movements and actions.

For I have made all the arts and crafts of which painting is the principal source. Architecture and sculpture are in some degree from it, the mechanical trades are involved, and even the art of cutting with weapons are impossible, formed by considering what I had submerged everything under to determine what the art of painting, in their painted houses, their works of gold, metal, in tapestries, in ornaments, in clothing and in arms, in the variety of their works, one may readily learn that here is the source of all the world, the noble lady Painting was the origin and mistress of all these productions, arts and sciences, for her domain even into women's composition and beauty.

So that who will consider and understand human nature without doubt that there are nothing but the same painting in painting, and he will also find that the painter has the skills which which never has been found, and of doing all the other arts, more grace and elegance than those that work in them, when it comes to him a true painter or designerman.<sup>38</sup>

Later, in the third dialogue, Michelangelo is quoted in the same way arguing that disegno is the basis of all human action and with which we are by now altogether familiar:

Let this be plain to all, design is discourse, or as it is called in Latin, drawing (disegno), constitutes the foundation for all other (arts) of painting and of sculpture and of whatever other kind of painting (genera de pictura) and is the source of all invention. Let him who has attained the possession of this art, he possesses a great treasure, he will be able to make himself any manner (figuras suas aliasque mechanice artis), but not varied, and he will find no wall on side of a building for which narrow and small for his great imaginings (mechanicis imaginibus). He will be able to paint fortresses in the ancient Italian fashion, with all its small mingling and variety of styles. He will be able to paint very minutely (parva minutissime) with more skill, daring and patient labor, consider a painter's than most painters can; finally, in the vast space (spaciosa parte) of a piece of parchment he will be most perfect and grand, as great as in all other ways of working.<sup>39</sup>

The idea that disegno constituted a principle capable of uniting at least the most painting and sculpture—and at most a great many more—was associated with Michelangelo from the early sixteenth century, and even the first scheme in all likelihood reflect not only his sympathies and the reaction of others to his works, but also his intentions and aspirations. As we have seen, Pomponio Gaurico in 1504 called him a distinguished marble sculptor, "sculptor pictor," perhaps on the pattern of Donatello. Michelangelo's self-identification with disegno in this respect may also be indicated in the well-known drawing (Bd. 17v) with the inscription "Disce, Antonio, disce, Antonio, disce, and do not lose time," which however hopeless the urging might have been in the case of Antonio Mini, suggests in rather more insipid terms Donatello's supposed advice to his students.<sup>40</sup> The two arts were expanded to three, perhaps at about the same time, completing the total of the "arts of design." Benito referred to Michelangelo as "sculptor, architect and architect painter," possibly as early as the first decade of the Cinquecento, although Michelangelo's name—when here broadening of his own activity into the field of architecture probably here upon Benito's formulation.<sup>41</sup> It was generally believed that Michelangelo's desire of these interlaced rings of words symbolized his mastery of the three arts, "his arses impressa," as Vasari called it,<sup>42</sup> was a signature on blocks of marble he had quarried and appears in the drawings of marble for the Medici Chapel.<sup>43</sup> If contemporary suggestions about the meaning of the device are correct, then Michelangelo had made the idea an article of his personal iconography by the 1520s.<sup>44</sup> After Michelangelo had been in Rome slightly less than a year, on September 1, 1533, Paul III issued his brief declaring Michelangelo's unsurpassed excellence in sculpture, painting and architecture. Antonio Billi and the Antonino Magliabechiano followed the same pattern,<sup>45</sup> as did Antonio when he praised Michelangelo as "sculptor, painter and architect."<sup>46</sup> In 1548, when the Dialogo di Donato Cionaccio were written, Michelangelo is made to refer to himself as "sculptor, painter and architect" in order, with false modesty, to insist that he is not more, not also a poet and Divine scholar.<sup>47</sup> The name is yet for the sixteenth-century introduction to Vasari's Life: seeing men struggling in error, God "was disposed to send us even a spirit universally able in each art and every profession, to show what
