INTRODUCTION

The design of mechanical ventilation systems for small, tightly sealed buildings is a complex task. This paper presents a modeling study of ventilation in manufactured houses. The study involves the use of a computer program to simulate the airflow and contaminant concentrations in a house with various ventilation systems. The results of the study are presented in terms of airflow rates and contaminant concentrations. The study shows that mechanical ventilation systems can significantly improve indoor air quality in manufactured houses.

The first problem in the design of mechanical ventilation systems is the determination of the required airflow rate. This is done by calculating the volume of the space and the number of air changes per hour required. The second problem is the selection of the ventilation system. There are several different types of mechanical ventilation systems, each with its own advantages and disadvantages. The third problem is the design of the ductwork. The ductwork must be designed to deliver the required airflow rate to the spaces being ventilated. The fourth problem is the selection of the controls. The controls must be designed to operate the ventilation system in a way that maintains the required indoor air quality.

The second problem in the design of mechanical ventilation systems is the selection of the ventilation system. There are several different types of mechanical ventilation systems, each with its own advantages and disadvantages.
