ABSTRACT: This paper discusses several hypermedia facilities built on top of the Andrew Toolkit (ATK) and their use in ATK applications. As a general-purpose, multimedia, application-development system, ATK permits many kinds of links, references and other connections to be made within pieces of content and between pieces of content, regardless of the content's medium. We argue that starting with a multimedia architecture facilitates the construction of all forms of hypermedia. Four specific hypermedia facilities implemented with ATK are discussed: an integrated web and indexing system (Help), a simple multimedia link facility (Link), a cross reference (Textref) capability, and a link-supporting embedded object language (Ness). As a toolkit, ATK is used to build other applications which inherit ATK's hypermedia facilities. Therefore we consider briefly the way that hypermedia facilities are used in conventional applications, such as mail systems.

KEY WORDS: Hypertext, Implementation, Multimedia.

1 Introduction

Considerable effort has been devoted to cataloging dozens of different forms of links for hypertext [Meyrowitz 1989]. Unfortunately, if one sets out to build a system incorporating each as a special case, the implementation effort becomes unwieldy before the benefits become apparent. In this paper we argue that it is preferable to begin by building a general-purpose multimedia architecture; it is then trivial to integrate a variety of link types.
