The Torrents of Spring Ivan Turgenev, 2016-01-06 THE TORRENTS OF SPRING Years of gladness Days of joy Like the torrents of spring They hurried away From an Old Ballad At two o'clock in the night he had gone back to his study He had dismissed the servant after the candles were lighted and throwing himself into a low chair by the hearth he hid his face in both hands Never had he felt such weariness of body and of spirit He had passed the whole evening in the company of charming ladies and cultivated men some of the ladies were beautiful almost all the men were distinguished by intellect or talent he himself had talked with great success even with brilliance and for all that never yet had the taedium vitae of which the Romans talked of old the disgust for life taken hold of him with such irresistible such suffocating force Had he been a little younger he would have cried with misery weariness and exasperation a biting burning bitterness like the bitter of wormwood filled his whole soul A sort of clinging repugnance a weight of loathing closed in upon him on all sides like a dark night of autumn and he did not know how to get free from this darkness this bitterness Sleep it was useless to reckon upon he knew he should not sleep
