When the fathers of the present generation were young men and George the Third ruled the land they imagined that the whole interior of Africa was one howling wilderness of burning sand roamed over by brown tribes in the north and south and by black tribes if human beings there were on either side of the equator and along the west coast The maps then existing afforded them no information Of the Mountains of the Moon they knew about as much as of the mountains in the moon The Nile was not explored its sources unknown the course of the Niger was a mystery They were aware that the elephant rhinoceros cameleopard zebra lion and many other strange beasts ranged over its sandy deserts but very little more about them than the fact of their existence was known They knew that on the north coast dwelt the descendants of the Greek and Roman colonists and of their Arab conquerors that there were such places as Tangiers Tripoli Tunis Algiers with its piratical cruisers who carried off white men into slavery Morocco with an emperor addicted to cutting off heads Salee which sent forth its rovers far over the ocean to plunder merchantmen and a few other towns and forts for the possession of which Europeans had occasionally knocked their heads together From the west coast they had heard that ivory and gold dust was to be procured as well as an abundant supply of negroes whose happy lot it was to be carried off to cultivate the plantations of the West Indies and America but except that they worshipped fetishes of their manners and customs or at what distance from the coast they came their ignorance was profound They possibly were acquainted with the fact that the Portuguese had settlements at Loango Angola and Benguela and that Hottentots and Kaffirs were to be found at the Cape where a colony had been taken from the Dutch but with that colony except in the immediate neighbourhood of Cape Town where ships to and from India touched they were but slightly acquainted Eastward if they troubled their heads about the matter they had a notion that there was a terribly wild coast inhabited by fierce savages and northward inside the big island of Madagascar that the Portuguese had some settlements for slaving purposes that further north again was Zanzibar and that the mainland was without a town or spot where civilised man was to be found till the Strait of Bab el Mandeb at the mouth of the Red Sea was reached That there towards the interior was the wonderful country of Abyssinia in which the Queen of Sheba once ruled and Nubia the birthplace from time immemorial of black slaves and that flowing northward the mysterious Nile made its way down numerous cataracts fertilising the land of Egypt on its annual overflows till passing the great city of Cairo it entered the Mediterranean by its numberless mouths About Egypt to be sure more was known than of all the rest of the continent together that there were pyramids and ruined cities colossal statues temples and tombs crocodiles and hippopotami in the waters of the sacred river and Christian Copts and dark skinned Mahommedans dwelling on its banks But few had explored the mighty remains of its past glory or made their way either to the summits or into the interiors of its mountain like edifices Those who had read Herodotus believed in a good many wonders which that not incredulous historian narrates The late discoveries of Livingstone however prove that Herodotus had obtained a more correct account of the sources of the Nile than has hitherto been supposed Indeed free range was allowed to the wildest imagination and the most extravagant stories found ready believers there being no one with authority to contradict them When however Bruce and other travellers made their way further than any civilised man had before penetrated into the interior of the continent their accounts were discredited and people were disappointed when they were told that many of their cherished notions had no foundation in truth in fact up to the commencement of the present century the greater part of Africa was a terra incognita and only by slow and painful degrees and during a comparatively late period has a knowledge of some of its more important geographical features been obtained We will now set forth and accompany in succession the most noted of the various travellers who pushing their way into that long unknown interior bravely encountering its savage and treacherous tribes its fever giving climate famine hardships dangers and difficulties of every description have contributed to fill up some of the numerous blank places on the map Although by their showing sand enough and to spare and vast rocky deserts are to be found there are wide districts of the greatest fertility possessed of many natural beauties elevated and cool regions where even the European can retain his health and strength and enjoy existence lofty mountains magnificent rivers and broad lakes and many curious and interesting objects not more wonderful however than those of other parts of the globe while the inhabitants in every direction though often savage and debased differ in no material degree from the other descendants of Ham
