ABSTRACT

This conceptual study explores the long-term effects of parental death during childhood on individuals' later stages of life, utilising Rodgers' evolutionary method of concept analysis. The early loss of a parent is a profound event that can have enduring psychological, emotional, and social consequences, shaping identity, relationships, and mental health throughout adulthood. By systematically reviewing and synthesising existing literature, this study aims to clarify and refine the concept of "long-term effects" associated with childhood parental loss. Key attributes, antecedents, and consequences of this phenomenon are identified, and a comprehensive conceptual model is developed to illustrate the complex interplay of factors influencing adult outcomes. This study also constructs a model case, drawing on real-life narratives, to demonstrate the practical application of the conceptual framework. The findings are expected to contribute to a deeper understanding of the enduring impact of childhood parental death, offering valuable insights for researchers, clinicians, and policymakers focused on bereavement, child development, and mental health.

However, when this loss occurs during childhood, the effects can be particularly devastating. Children rely on their parents not just for basic care, but as their primary caregivers, guides, and protectors. Losing a parent during these formative years can disrupt their sense of security and identity, leading to long-lasting consequences that extend far into adulthood.

Growing up without a parent is an experience that brings unique challenges. The absence of a key figure in their life often results in significant emotional, social, and developmental hurdles. This study seeks to explore these long-term consequences through a conceptual analysis, aiming to shed light on how childhood bereavement shapes adult life. In "Death of a Parent: Transition to a New Adult Identity," Debra Umberson (2003) explores the profound
