

Power Sharing In Schools

As many organizational systems writers observe, schools are open systems. To at least some degree, they interact with their environment. One important element in that environment is the formally-constituted bodies representing the local community. In the case of an overseas international school, this body is usually termed "the Board of Directors" or simply "the Board." This body may include the actual owners of the school, important individuals within the community, parents, embassy officials, and important local persons. International school boards face two unusual conditions. First they work in a multi-national environment in which exists considerable ambiguity as to how "American" their schools should be and endure frequent turn-overs of membership.
