

Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Among African Americans in an Inner City Mental Health Clinic

Ann C. Schwartz, M.D.

Rebekah L. Bradley, Ph.D.

Melissa Sexton, M.Div.

Alissa Sherry, Ph.D.

Kerry J. Ressler, M.D., Ph.D.

This study examined 184 African-American outpatients in a mental health clinic in the inner city to define the rate of occurrence of traumatic experience and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). This population experienced a high rate of severe trauma. Forty-three percent were found to have PTSD, as measured by the PTSD Symptom Scale. Finally, a chart review of 72 participants found that only 11 percent of participants who met DSM-IV criteria for PTSD also had a chart diagnosis of PTSD. PTSD is a common yet underrecognized and undertreated source of psychiatric morbidity in this urban community of African Americans with low socioeconomic status. (Psychiatric Services 56:212–215, 2005)

The prevalence of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is estimated to range from 9 to 12 percent in the general population (1,2).

Dr. Schwartz, Dr. Bradley, and Dr. Ressler are affiliated with the department of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at Emory University School of Medicine, 505 Jesse Hill Jr. Drive, P.O. Box 26238, Atlanta, Georgia 30303 (e-mail, aschwartz@emory.edu). Ms. Sexton is with the comparative literature program at Emory University in Atlanta. Dr. Sherry is with the department of psychology at the University of Texas at Austin.

These figures likely underestimate the prevalence among residents of urban, economically disadvantaged areas, because this population is at higher risk than the general population of exposure to traumatic events. This greater risk of victimization among urban residents can be attributed to a variety of factors, including low socioeconomic status and high rates of violence in the inner city. Despite the potential high rate of PTSD in the urban population, trauma is likely underrecognized and PTSD is often underdiagnosed (3,4). These findings are compounded by the possibility that mental illness, particularly affective disorders, tends to be underdiagnosed in the African-American community (5).

In this study, we used a survey design to examine whether the rates of trauma and PTSD among low-income African-American mental health patients from an urban area were higher than the rates that have been reported for the general population. We examined whether PTSD was underdiagnosed in our study population. We also examined whether persons with PTSD were more likely than those without PTSD to have worse clinical and quality-of-life characteristics. Finally, we examined whether persons with PTSD were more likely than those without PTSD to be at higher risk of developing comorbid psychiatric diagnoses.

Methods

African-American patients were recruited from an urban outpatient mental health clinic in Atlanta, Georgia, during an 18-month period from 2001 to 2002. Patients were recruited if they presented for treatment that was not focused on a crisis. The study was limited to African Americans because no studies have specifically examined PTSD among African Americans in the inner city; this group is understudied, and the vast majority of patients at this clinic are African American. We approached 200 patients, and 184 completed our survey. Patients were eligible for our study if they were aged 18 to 75 years, were able to understand English, and had been active patients in the clinic for two or more years. Patients were excluded from our study if they were mentally retarded, scored under 24 on the Mini-Mental State Exam, or were not able to give valid informed consent. This study was approved by the institutional review board of Emory University and the research oversight committee of Grady Health System. We obtained informed consent from all patients.

The initial survey included demographic information; the Mini-Mental State Exam; the traumatic events inventory, which is a 13-question self-report that assesses traumatic events, frequency of events, age at worst incident, and feelings of terror, horror, and helplessness (unpublished scale, Rothbaum BO, David-
