

Review of Research in Distance Education, 1990 to 1999

Zane L. Berge and Susan Mrozowski

Abstract

This review examines the research literature in distance education over a ten-year period from 1990 to 1999. Using four prominent, peer-reviewed, English-language distance education journals and the dissertation abstracts that were related to the field of distance education, the authors found 1,419 total articles and abstracts. Only those articles reporting a research methodology ($n = 890$) were included in this study. A categorization system based on Sherry (1996) was used to categorize the content. The patterns across journals and dissertation abstracts indicated a predominance of pedagogical issues being researched. Three-fourths of the articles and dissertations used a descriptive methodology. Implications for reviews such as this include that, while they can not correct sloppy or short-sighted research, they can begin to address gaps in past distance education research. They can dramatically show the need for a research agenda and future vision in the field of distance education.

Introduction

The research in distance education conducted to date has received harsh and consistent criticism. Criticism often focuses on (1) noncontrol for extraneous variables, (2) lack of use of randomly selected subjects, (3) lack of validity and reliability of the instruments used to measure student outcomes, and (4) inadequate control for the feelings and attitudes of the students and faculty (i.e., "reactive effects") (Anglin and Morrison 2000; Diaz 2000; Perraton 2000; Phipps and Merisotis 1999; Reeves 2000; Saba 2000).

We conducted a review of previous distance education research. The materials ranged from a comprehensive review of distance learning literature (Moore and Thompson 1997) to a focus on specific topics such as faculty issues (Dillon and Walsh 1992), distance learning studies in the United States military (Barry and Runyan 1995), learner issues with hypermedia (Dillon and Gabbard 1998), general trends in distance
