Nigeria no doubt is one of China's largest markets in Africa. The negative influence Chinese interest in the Nigerian economy has on her energy sector and on development generally is alarming and the rural areas are mostly affected. Rural development is a sine qua non of sustainable national development. Nigerian markets are flooded with Chinese products ranging from generators to rechargeable lamps which are mostly needed to power industries and also generate electricity. Dependency theory provided the theoretical construct for this paper. It was observed that these products such as rechargeable lamps and generating sets may be a welcomed development to cushion the effect of epileptic power supply in the urban centres and lack of electricity in the rural areas but the spillover effects on the Nigerian economy cannot be overemphasised. The paper also discovered the unfortunate situation of how contracts are awarded to Chinese firms in regards to the energy sector. The question which must be critically examined is can a bone be given to a dog for safe keeping? Based on these findings, the paper recommends that the federal government should genuinely and aggressively pursue the issue of rural development especially in terms of rural electrification.

Keywords: relations, rural development.

Introduction

Many years after independence, Nigeria received herculean western string attached aids which have greatly impeded the development of the country. No wonder during the General Sani Abacha's military regime, Beijing's no-strings-attached development projects were increasingly welcomed. This was as a result of Nigeria's leadership growing resentful of Western conditions for aid and investment, and many Nigerians began to question what benefit of economic dependence on the West has achieved for Nigeria. China turned out to become an alternative with the hope of growing the Nigerian economy. Paradoxically, as will be portrayed in this paper, Chinese influence on Nigerian economy has turned a twist in the curve. Much of the local industries have had to unfavourably compete with Chinese firms which have succeeded in driving them out of business hence rendering many jobless.

Nigeria's subsequent adoption of a new approach to international trade in response to balancing traditional Western partners is what resulted in the influx of Chinese firms and goods into the Nigerian market. This phenomenon has adversely affected the power sector, and the textile industry. For the power industry, the Nigerian market is flooded with
