of regional recreation systems Two separate state surveys of 5 205 sample households in Oregon and Washington were conducted over a 12 month period during 1987 Recreation activities travel patterns and natural resources used for recreation within and among the states were measured using telephone and mail instruments Principal components analysis of travel patterns within Oregon and Washington was used to delineate functional recreation regions within the two state area As a result five recreation regions were identified The spatial and temporal characteristics of one recreation functional region in Oregon were described further using Lorenz Curve directional bias and net flow compactness and connectivity indices and peaking index analyses The final element of the study was to integrate the conceptual and empirical data in a simulation of institutional arrangements for regional recreation planning The simulation was guided by a typology of organizational contexts relevant to recreation resource planning both present and future The applicability of the conceptual framework to regional resource management activities other than outdoor recreation was discussed
