✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

One of the largest financial centers, not only in Asia, but also all over the globe, Singapore offers numerous opportunities to develop any business. Nowadays, it is considered an attractive venue for companies: According to the recent Global Financial Centres Index rankings, it is the third most significant center, having managed to outrank such cities as Hong Kong and Tokyo (Choudhury 2016). However, financial reasons are not the only criteria that should be examined. It is not possible to conduct various affairs without taking into account the peculiarities of the country or city and its political and legal issues. Whether a company plans to cooperate with Singaporean organizations or takes an independent stand in the Singaporean market, the task of primary importance is to scrutinize the political environment, particularly its political system, structure, political parties, and the possible political risks. Another essential sphere is the legal environment: Prior to performing any action, one should be aware of the characteristics of the legal system, legal issues in the international business, and legal risks.

Political Environment in Singapore

Political System

The governmental authorities possess the most considerable political power. Singapore is a unitary state and a parliamentary republic. Its present-day political system is connected with the past. In 1963, Singapore won its independence from the United Kingdom as a part of Malaysia, and two years later, Singapore further separated from the latter; nowadays, it is a republic within the Commonwealth (Department for International Trade 2016). The transformed Westminster Parliamentary system has been implemented; the unicameral parliament consists of the elected Members of Parliament and the Nominated Members of Parliament. Each Parliament may sit only five years, and after that, new elections are scheduled; the last elections took place in
