Alex Bannatyne

THE ABOVE TITLE is also the title of my latest book which has just been published by Academic Therapy Publications. I make no apology for using the title again or for giving the concepts expressed in the book further exposure in this paper because I wish to see every learning disability teacher and reading teacher use an auditory-vocal psycholinguistic approach to the teaching of reading, spelling, writing, and language.

It has always puzzled me that so many colleges and teachers continue to promote and use "whole-word" or "sight" techniques with children who are either learning to read or are in need of remediation. Even the popular phonics-linguistics methods, though a considerable improvement on basal readers, very often do not place sufficient stress on training clear articulation or keen ears for phonemes.

The English language is a phonetic language in which the visual symbols (graphemes) represent sounds (phonemes) and it is the sounds which, in various sequential combinations, form words. The visual symbols (graphemes) never directly represent objects or concepts (meanings) except in ideographic or logographic languages such as Chinese. In a phonetic language meanings are always the property of (are associated with) the spoken word, not the printed word. The printed word is associated only with the spoken word. Thus we get the following associative memory links in a phonetic language:
