

The Five Regions of Georgia

There are five different and unique regions within the boundaries of the state of Georgia. Each of the regions is different and unique in a variety of physical and geographical ways. Georgia is diverse in many ways across the large state, including various land features and climates. The regions have developed differently because of the climate and landscape. Parts of Georgia are at sea level, while others are over 4,500 feet above sea level. Georgia is the largest state in terms of landmass east of the Mississippi River. The features of the different regions have all impacted how people and economies have developed in those regions.

The Appalachian Plateau region is located in the far northwestern corner of the state of Georgia. The physical geography in this area is mostly moderate hills with some flat areas. This area has very mild, temperate summers. However, the winter will face snowfall and ice at times. Agriculture is significantly limited here because of the poor, infertile soil. Corn and soybeans are grown sparsely in some areas, but they are not highly profitable crops. This area provided economic value to the state in the past through mineral and coal reserves. This is the only area that has coal and mineral deposits in Georgia. There is also tourism and forestry. This area has no major rivers or river systems but has some unique and interesting cave systems. It is also home to Lookout Mountain, a popular location having views of Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

The Valley and Ridge region is located in the northern part of Georgia. The physical features of this area are long parallel ridges and valleys. The ridges look like mountains, but only reach heights of 1600 feet above sea level. These ridges are separated from each other with wide valleys that possess fertile soil. The climate is much like that of the Appalachian Plateau region with snow and ice in the winter and moderate temperatures during the summer. The temperatures overall are slightly cooler because of the increased elevation. This region has small amounts of farming in the valleys for soybeans, corn, wheat, and cotton. Some wood is harvested here for timber, but not major amounts. There are also textile factories that produce carpet and some moderate amounts of mining. Dalton, Georgia is called the carpet capital of the world because of the volumes of carpet produced and shipped internationally.

The Blue Ridge region is in the northeastern corner of Georgia. This region has a mountain range called the Blue Ridge Mountains that reach an elevation of over 4,500 feet above sea level in some places.
