ABSTRACT

Technological revolutionary changes have boosted mobile learning's evolution from supplementary material for teaching to a flexible, strategic, and convenient resource, driving new paths in higher education. With global increases in wireless internet access and the advent of highly functional smartphones and tablets, which have impacted the rise in mobile device ownership, mobile learning has expanded its applications as a direct way to implement tailored learning settings. Notably, during the COVID-19 pandemic, together with other educational technologies, it became a solicited tool in remote education. In this systematic review, we will explore how educators and researchers have been documenting the development and impact of mobile learning tools in the teaching and learning process since the COVID-19 outbreak. Results show that, embedded with online higher education programs, mobile learning has empowered interaction in content creation, communication, and collaboration between learners and instructors, significantly impacting learning effectiveness. Moreover, although this technology is well established in higher education, it remains attractive for educators who actively use it because of its pedagogic potential.

1 INTRODUCTION

Mobile learning (also known as m-learning) has been characterized as a multifaceted process involving theoretical-based pedagogical approaches to tackle educational requirements (Hao, Dennen, & Mei, 2017). Revolutionary changes in the 1980s, with the introduction of pocket and handheld computers, have been recognized as the first steps of what we today consider mobile learning (Educause, 2019). With time, the functional advantages of mobile devices such as smartphones and tablets, compared to laptops or desktop computers, made them a solicited resource for teaching-learning (Mătă et al., 2021). Likewise, the integration of smartphones and tablets into learning processes, the availability of powerful and intuitive mobile applications, and accelerating mobile internet
