

The poor quality of the photographs, most of which are pointless, induces a hurried turning of the pages. There is nowhere a hint that organ transplants succumb to intense vasoconstriction, that skin grafts but not lymphocytes can sensitize an animal to a subsequently transplanted kidney or heart, that the renal transplant reaction is nephrotoxic but not nephritogenic, or that the renal and heart second-set reaction is a very baffling event.

MTP International Review of Science. Biochemistry, Series One. Volume 10. Defence and Recognition. Ed. by R. R. PORTER. Butterworth, London, 1973. Pp. 419. Price £8.50.

The publishers claim that their MTP International Review of Science Series is an 'authoritative review of entire disciplines' covering subject matter which is 'extensive, systematic and critical'. With respect to this particular book, volume 10 of the Biochemistry Series One, such claims appear well justified. It is well written by a group of internationally distinguished experts in the field of immunology, and its aim is primarily to introduce biochemists to the whole field of immunology. It would, however, be a valuable addition to any card-carrying immunologist's bookshelf. The subject matter is both comprehensive and topical. The book provides a very well-balanced and integrated consideration of both cellular and humoral aspects of defence and recognition.

Over the last two decades, particularly following Porter's pioneering work, a wealth of hard data on the structure, biosynthesis and genetics of antibodies has been accumulated and such information is well described. The reactions and functions of antibodies are perhaps less well covered. Consistent with contemporary developments, the cellular basis of the immune response is given due consideration. Similarly, current knowledge of histocompatibility antigens is extensively discussed at both the chemical and genetic level. There are also well written chapters on interferon, tolerance, antigenicity and immunogenicity and complement. Each of the eleven chapters has an extensive bibliography and adequate illustrative material. This book has succeeded in giving a clear and reasonably balanced account of what is an exciting and rapidly developing field of biology.

Host Resistance. 'Non-Specific' Factors Influencing. A Re-examination. Ed. by W. BRAUN and J. UNGAR. Karger, Basel, 1973. Pp. 471. Price £19.45.

This book is a compilation of papers presented at an international symposium in Switzerland in June of 1972. The book does not contain any of the discussions generated by each paper. Some of the references contain titles and others do not. The book is carefully indexed. The text is divided into six sections: Immune Mechanisms in Primitive Animals; Endocytic Cells—Properties, Recognition Mechanisms, and Functions; Chemotaxis; Development, Regulation and Modification of Functions of Immunocompetent Cells; Extracellular Factors that Modify Host Resistance; and Related Topics. There are fifty-one papers. These cover most aspects of non-specific factors that influence host resistance. The section on invertebrates contains two general papers and one paper dealing with snails and another with amoebae. The section on endocytic cells contains, among others, a paper on anti-microbial systems in polymorphonuclear leucocytes, and another on polymorphonuclear leucocyte dysfunction in patients with infections. There are also several papers on macro-
