

Roadmap for preparing teacher of Arts Education

"The teaching of art is about more than the teaching of art" (Eisner: 2001, p.10). This statement by Eisner opens up opportunities for Art educators to consider a range of alternative aims for art education as well as teachers' roles in his book (2002) entitled 'The Arts and the Creation of Mind', Eisner also shows the various ways in which making and appreciating Art are cognitive endeavours. Eisner describes some of the approaches that direct the aims and content of Art Education today. He describes them separately to make each approach vivid; in practice however, he emphasises that they are likely to be integrated as one unit in any programme. These approaches are: Discipline-Based Art Education, Visual Culture, Creative Problem-Solving, Creative Self-Expression, Art Education as Preparation for the world of work, the Arts and Cognitive Development, using the arts to promote academic performance, and integrated arts. As Eisner (2002:41) says "Today these and other functions of arts education are put forward as reasons to include arts in school programs". These aims go further than simply focusing upon teaching students specific skills, practices, and bodies of knowledge.

Current studies also suggest that prospective Art Education teachers should learn much more than studio competency (Eisner 2001). Therefore, Art Education programmes should move away from the heavy emphasis on Art studio toward a broader teacher preparation programme. Current studies, such as Villeneuve (2003), Duncum (2003), Freedman (2003) and Kelfer-Boyd et al. (2003) show the importance of including visual culture in the Education, and consequently increasing attention is being given to the idea of teaching Visual Culture Art Education (VCAE) not only at school levels but also in pre-service and in-service Art teacher education.

Art educators, policy makers, administrators and students should understand also that good schools alone will never be good enough, they need to make a good partnership with a wide range of individuals and organisations in the community. Activities such as visiting Art Museums and Galleries, Artists in School (AIS), and Environmental Education through Art Education are essential for Art teachers in pre-service as well as in-service education. Moreover, studies by Osborne (2000), Levi (2000), and Vallance (2000) discuss a range of topics related to Art teacher education and show the importance of Art museums in educating learners in schools, as well as the importance of these museums in developing Art student-teachers in pre-service and in-service Art Education.

Furthermore, there is a growing interest in examining pre-service art teachers' beliefs about teaching Art as well as their views about the programmes, on which they studied. Example of doctoral studies, which include the views and opinions of this group, are Obiokor (2002), Cohen Evron (2001), Sahin (2001), Frenzel (2001). These studies attempt to include Art teachers' views on the implementation of major Art Education reform initiatives with implications for art teachers.

In addition, they focused on understanding the complexity of the way teacher's beliefs are constructed and they suggest that becoming a teacher, and being one, is more than learning to fulfil a function through possessing pedagogical skills, gaining experience in the classroom, or learning updated theories. Frenzel (2001) recommends that the teachers should make a balance in their own personal growth and in their
