Childhood and Youth Cohen Brandes, Georg Morris, 2021-08-24 Book Excerpt He was little and looked at the world from below All that happened went on over his head Everyone looked down to him But the big people possessed the enviable power of lifting him to their own height or above it It might so happen that suddenly without preamble as he lay on the floor rummaging and playing about and thinking of nothing at all his father or a visitor would exclaim Would you like to see the fowls of Kjöge And with the same he would feel two large hands placed over his ears and the arms belonging to them would shoot straight up into the air That was delightful Still there was some disappointment mingled with it Can you see Kjöge now was a question he could make nothing of What could Kjöge be But at the other question Do you see the fowls he vainly tried to see something or other By degrees he understood that it was only a phrase and that there was nothing to look for It was his first experience of empty phrases and it made an impression It was just as great fun though when the big people said to him Would you like to be a fat lamb Let us play at fat lamb He would be flung over the man's shoulder like a slaughtered lamb and hang there or jump up and ride with his legs round the man's hips then climb valiantly several steps higher get his legs round his shoulders and behold he was up on the giddy height Then the man would take him round the waist swing him over and after a mighty somersault in the air he would land unscathed on his feet upon the floor It was a composite kind of treat of three successive stages first came the lofty and comfortable seat then the more interesting moment with a feeling nevertheless of being on the verge of a fall and then finally the jump during which everything was upside down to him But too he could take up attitudes down on the floor that added to his importance as it were and obliged the grown up people to look at him When they said Can you stand like the Emperor Napoleon he would draw himself up bring one foot a little forward and cross his arms like the little figure on the bureau
