Hyun-jung Jessie Je, 2018-06-12 In an ever more globalized and pluralized world more attention is paid to engaging private parties in the process of trade policy making as non state actors are often directly affected by trade policy shaped by governments However despite growing interest in this issue there has been a relative lack of academic research on public private relationships in trade policy making under any kind of framework The book Public Private Relationships in Trade Policy making proposes an analytical framework to examine various levels of public engagement both in the international and national arena By analyzing the WTO at the international level and the US EU and Korea at the national level based on the author's proposed framework this book goes beyond a mere descriptive approach to public engagement in trade policy making to offer meaningful implications for policymakers in developing countries which are increasingly acknowledging the importance of public private relationships in the field of trade
