

philosophy is that interpretation is an open process which no single vision can conclude'⁴⁴ – they also will come to accept a more egalitarian tafsir and certainly one that is inclusive of women's voices.

Towards a hermeneutics of equality

What might such a tafsir entail? Even more significantly – given that the content of knowledge is never independent of the methods by which it is produced – what kind of a hermeneutic approach might generate it? Before considering Wadud's tafsir, therefore, it would be useful to examine her conceptual and methodological framework more closely.

Wadud begins her critique of traditional tafsir, as well as her own exegesis of the Qur'an, by clarifying that what 'proceeds from the text ... in the name of tafsir, is not one and the same as the divine will'.⁴⁵ This distinction between 'divine speech and its earthly realisation'⁴⁶ is an old one in Muslim theology and one that the Qur'an also makes.⁴⁷ Yet, over the course of time, Muslim interpretive communities have come to see their own tafsir hence their own interpretive authority, as being on a par with revelation. For example, the Hanafi legal school – which trains its adherents in the time-honoured method of reading "backward" through the scholarship of previous generations in an attempt to ensure "continuity with the past" – holds that 'the authority of the practice defined by later generations [is equivalent to] the authority of revelation'.⁴⁸ While equating their own authority with that of revelation allows legal and interpretive schools to claim legitimacy, it also collapses divine discourse with its human interpretations, thus permitting the displacement of biases onto the Divine. This confusion of the Qur'an with its tafsir also discourages new readings of the Qur'an since it allows interpretive communities to misrepresent critiques of tafsir as critiques of the Qur'an and to marginalise new readings in the name of adhering to a religiously sanctioned tradition. They then are able to protect not only their own hegemony, but also the hegemony of the religious knowledge (on which they draw) produced by a small number of male scholars in the early years of Islam. While not all these scholars were misogynists of course, the sexual ethos of the times in which they wrote (the Middle Ages) was, and they could not but be influenced by it to varying degrees.⁴⁹ This is why Wadud's distinction between God's Speech and human renditions of it is so crucial.

If adhering to this distinction marks Wadud as a traditionalist, it also allows her to embrace the modern hermeneutic insight that reading is subjective and incomplete, a fact Muslims overlook when it comes to traditional tafsir. This view allows her to free the Qur'an of its (anti-women) mistradings while also permitting her to argue in favour of some readings and against others. Thus, recognising the role of subjectivity in reading does not keep Wadud from arguing that some interpretations are in fact better than others. This is not a contradictory position in that the Qur'an itself recommends reading it for its best meanings (and also specifies some principles for doing so),⁵⁰ establishing both that it is open to multiple readings and that not all readings may be equally good. Hermeneutics as a discipline also rests on the premise that while 'multiple readings are not per se mutually exclusive, not all interpretations are thereby equal'.⁵¹ Belief in textual polysemy thus does not render one a moral relativist; nor does embracing monosemy (the idea that there is only one correct reading of a text) signify great virtue.

Secondly, although Wadud does not put it in these terms, she reads the Qur'an as both a 'historically situated'⁵² text and as a 'complex hermeneutic totality'.⁵³ That is, she explains the Qur'an's teachings in terms of the social and historical contexts Islam sought to reform and also in terms of the linguistic, grammatical, and syntactical structures of the text itself. Although, as noted, conservatives reject a 'historicising understanding' of the Qur'an,⁵⁴ many contemporary Muslim scholars argue in favour of it. Mahmud Mohamed Taha, for instance, held that such an approach was essential for deriving general principles from the Qur'an. The difference is that Taha held that the distinction between the universal and the particular was built into revelation itself, specifically, into its historical periodisation into two phases:
