petroleum products and many food commodities in recent years The impacts of local climate change decrease crop yields in the longer run and through them productivity in the agricultural sector and all the implications this may have on both the livelihoods of those dependent on the sector as well as the rest of the economy The analysis also covered what happens when both global and local climate changes work simultaneously for each country Findings show that in all three countries the effects of climate change are negative for people and the economy GDP falls and livelihoods suffer Furthermore the prevalence of extreme variations in climate such as the droughts affecting Syria and the floods impacting Yemen draws attention to the potentially significant drawbacks that are likely to not only affect any strides towards economic growth and development but may also reverse such strides if appropriate policies are not in place to weather this storm The analyses in this book apply CGE models
