Osteoporosis Prevention Education Among Asian Indian Women Ashvini Mashru, 2005 Osteoporosis is a silently progressing metabolic bone disease that leads to loss of bone mass It is widely prevalent among Asian Indians and is a common cause of morbidity and mortality among them One major reason for this could be low intakes of calcium in the Asian Indian diet and lack of weight bearing exercise which can lead to osteoporosis at an earlier age Osteoporosis is emerging as a great public health risk among this population There needs to be an increased awareness and education regarding the sequel of this disease Therefore this study was done to evaluate the dietary calcium intake among Asian Indian women The goal of this study was to increase the subjects knowledge and understanding regarding calcium Subjects were Asian Indian women above age 40 Fifteen subjects were recruited for this study However data for only ten subjects was usable An identical pre and post tests were administered before and after the intervention The recommended dietary allowance RDA for calcium for women above 50 years is 1200mg day The mean calcium intake for this group was 1030mg day This showed that the subjects did not meet their calcium requirement as per the RDA The lowest calcium intake was 450mg day and the highest was 1700 mg day Eight of ten subjects 80% had calcium intakes lower than 1200mg day RDA Three out of ten subjects 30% had calcium intakes lower than 500mg day Individual post test scores did improve after the intervention The mean percent change in score was 77% The pre and the post tests were identical and had ten questions Before the intervention none of the subjects scored a 100% on the test but after the intervention seven out of ten subjects 70% scored a 100% on the test This shows that the subjects had increased and improvement their knowledge and understanding about calcium intake after the intervention Further research needs to be done specifically on this population with a larger sample size because of increased rates of osteoporosis With education it is possible to prevent osteoporosis
