Successful Career Women Cecilia Ann Northcutt, 1991-03-25 The dramatic increase in women's participation in the labor force has prompted considerable interest among researchers particularly those who are interested in women careers and career development However when considering career success for women the majority of past comparison research has used a male model for characteristics of success Cecilia Northcutt's study attempts to identify the personal characteristics that successful career women have in common across career fields and to formulate a more appropriate female model To identify general and specific characteristics of successful career women the author considers the following What characteristics do successful career women have in common regardless of their career field What factors might affect women's achievement motivation and self esteem What other factors might affect the self esteem and achievement motivation of successful career women and what factors do they share Do successful career women see themselves as successful and how do they define success Using data based on a questionnaire that gathered information on self esteem achievement motivation self descriptive words ethnicity age income level and occupation Northcutt offers some provocative suggestions about the personal and professional characteristics of successful career women Her work will interest sociologists and psychologists and will offer guidance to women who are entering the workforce as well as to women who are already there New Books National Defense University.
