

Otosclerosis and Stapedectomy

Otosclerosis is a disease where one of the bones of middle ear behind the ear drum becomes diseased. The stapes or "stirrup" bone is the smallest bone in the human body and is the last of the 3 bones that conduct sound from the ear drum to the inner ear that allows us to hear. Normally, the vibrations of the ear drum cause these little bones ("ossicles") to vibrate, which then gets transmitted to the inner ear. In patients with otosclerosis, there is an overgrowth of hard bone around the stapes, causing it to become fixed and unable to vibrate. This can significantly impact the hearing in the affected ear.

Who is affected by otosclerosis?

Otosclerosis typically affects women twice as often as men and can affect one or both ears. Approximately 50% of patients have a family history of the disease. It usually begins to affect people in their late-20s to mid-40s.

How do I know if I have otosclerosis?

The diagnosis is generally made in patients noting a significant loss of hearing in one or both ears. Your doctor will generally perform a comprehensive exam of your ears and will usually obtain a hearing test. Generally, the hearing test will demonstrate a pattern of hearing loss consistent with the diagnosis, though often your doctor may want to obtain a CT scan of your middle and inner ear to confirm the diagnosis or rule out other potential causes of your hearing loss.

What is a stapedectomy?

Stapedectomy is the most common surgical treatment for otosclerosis which involves removing the diseased stapes bone and replacing it with a prosthesis that functions in its place. Typically an outpatient surgery, it usually can be performed through an incision made in the ear canal where the eardrum is carefully lifted up to obtain access to the middle ear.

A high-power microscope is used for this type of delicate surgery and can be performed under general anesthesia or with just light sedation.
