

Annotated Bibliographies Source

An annotated bibliography is a description of a set of related sources that address a common topic. It is a very useful tool in helping you analyze sources and organize your research. Professors will often assign annotated bibliographies when they want to help you figure out which sources will be most important to your project and in what ways you will make use of the sources. At other times, professors assign them as an exercise in and of themselves, to help you take the first steps toward mastering a body of historical literature. Depending on the guidelines from your professor, a source entry in an annotated bibliography will be anywhere from a short paragraph to a page long.

What are the components of an annotated bibliography?

An annotated bibliography usually contains three parts:

- Source Citation: Like a regular bibliography, an annotated bibliography provides proper citation information for each source. Remember that historians usually use Chicago style. Visit our citation section for information about formatting your citations. Your professor may allow other styles, such as MLA; check which style your professor recommends.
- Source Summary: The first part of your entry will summarize the source concisely. Aim not to dazzle your professor with extensive detail, but to state briefly the topic and main argument of your source. If you are annotating a secondary source, in addition to summarizing the main idea, you will want to give information about how the source is organized, the main types of evidence the author relies on, and how the author makes his or her argument. If you are annotating a primary source, in addition to the main idea, explain the type of source (e.g. a letter, newspaper, census report, etc.), identify the author (include the author's position and other information to help the reader understand the writer's perspective and why s/he was in a position to create the source), and state the author's intended audience.
- Source Evaluation: Your source evaluation explains how the source contributes to a particular topic. If you are producing an annotated bibliography in anticipation of writing a research paper, your professor might ask you to consider exactly how you will use the source in your paper. What does the source do for your argument? Is it one of the key pieces of evidence supporting your case? Does it offer crucial background information? Does it present a counterpoint to your argument that you need to address? Other professors might want you to focus more on an evaluation of the source itself. In this case, be sure to discuss the strengths and weaknesses of the source. Did you find the argument persuasive? If so, explain what made the argument work well. Were you unconvinced by some of the author's claims? If so, explain why. You will also want to
