

Pilot implementation of the Curriculum "Promoting Learning Through Active Interaction (PLAI)" in a child with Sotos Syndrome

Sarris Dimitrios, Christodoulou Pincio, Christopoulou Foteini, Zaragas Harilaos, and Christopoulou Eleni

ABSTRACT

The present study focused on the implementation of the PLAI Program in a boy with Sotos syndrome, aged 10 years. The aim was to describe the results regarding the communication skills of the child after the pilot implementation of the specific Curriculum. Video observation and analysis were used to assess the child's communication skills, both before and after the implementation of the program. The PLAI program, which was implemented for about 4 months, focused on improving the child's communication skills, included similar activities and was based mainly on the strategy of routine and sensory cues. The results from the implementation of the individualized educational program were quite satisfactory, as a significant improvement in the communication skills of the specific child was found. The contribution of the Curriculum "Promoting Learning Through Active Interaction" is very important for the education of students with severe-multiple disabilities.

Keywords: communication skills, PLAI program, Sotos Syndrome.

1. INTRODUCTION

Sotos syndrome is a rare clinical entity of genetic etiology that causes physical overgrowth [1] during the first two to three years of life, usually accompanied by a delay in motor, cognitive and social development. This syndrome is also known as brain gigantism, due to the characteristic size and shape of the head. It was first described in 1964 by Sotos [2-4].

The clinical diagnostic criteria for Sotos syndrome can be summarized as follows:

- Overgrowth in the prenatal and postnatal period and especially in infancy [1], [5].
- Characteristic appearance of the face (upside down pear shape and usually hyperpigmentation of the skin) [1]. Children with this syndrome look more like each other than their siblings.
- Developmental delay: verbal [6], [7], motor [8] and cognitive [1], [9].
- Behavioral problems [10-12].
- Advanced Bone Age [13], [1], above the 90th percentile, as determined by an X-ray. That is, a birth with a body length over the 90th percentile. The head circumference is often above the 97th percentile position. As a result, in 100 children of the same chronological age, the child with Sotos syndrome has a larger head circumference than the other 97 children. Growth rate appears to decline during childhood or adolescence at the latest and the individual's final height tends to be within normal limits. Children with Sotos syndrome do not become "giants" [14]. Overgrowth observed in childhood does not continue into adulthood [14-16].

Of course, there are a number of other minor features that have been linked to Sotos syndrome. Emotional immaturity, dental problems (premature eruption of teeth, excessive wear, discoloration and gingivitis), ear infections, upper respiratory tract and urinary tract infections, heart problems [17-19], scoliosis [20], convulsions, kidney problems, hearing loss and vision problems [14], [18-19], [21-24].

More specifically, the symptoms of the Syndrome include a large and long head with a prominent forehead, large arms and legs-acromegaly from birth (an unusually increased
